

First Annual Report of Georgia Students' High School to College Transition

Contents of Report

This report contains two sections. The first section details aggregate college enrollment data by school system for the high school classes of 2000 through 2007. Each school system's report shows:

- The number and percentage of students enrolling in a postsecondary institution in Georgia, compared to the number and percentage enrolling out of state;

- The number and percentage of students enrolling in public postsecondary institutions compared to the number and percentage enrolling in private institutions;

- The 10 most popular (by enrollment) postsecondary institutions for each school system from 2000-07;

- The 10 most popular (by enrollment) out of state postsecondary institutions for each school system from 2000-07;

- The percentage of graduates in each school system who enrolled in any postsecondary institution.

The second section details similar information for the most recent class history available: the class of 2008. This section includes all of the information above at the state level along with more local details.

Introduction

One clear accountability measure for the public school system is the ability to prepare students for study in postsecondary education institutions. Whether they attend 4-year academic institutions, or technical colleges focused on specific careers, American students are being encouraged to pursue more formal education than ever.

Postsecondary enrollment is an accountability measure for high schools that has an independence beyond traditional measures such as test scores or graduation rates – it is an outside measure of the value of a particular high school's diploma.

Accurately tracking students as they transition from high school and into college has been technically difficult. Traditional methods of tracking students from high school as they cross into college have included exit interviews with graduates, follow-up surveys of graduates, and reports produced using existing state data on public institutions.

The National Student Clearinghouse (NSC) offers a more accurate way to address this issue. It tracks and verifies students' postsecondary enrollment through agreements with over 3,000 public and private colleges and universities across the country. NSC's institutional partnerships cover over 90% of the nation's postsecondary enrollment.

In 2008, the Governor's Office of Student Achievement (GOSA) entered into a contract with the National Student Clearinghouse to study postsecondary enrollment and other outcomes of Georgia's public high school graduates, using official graduate class data obtained from the Georgia Department of Education. GOSA's contract allows every school system in Georgia to work independently with NSC to do their own analyses, at no cost to the systems.

Because of the unique nature of NSC's database, GOSA has the ability to provide information on Georgia's graduates available nowhere else. For example, using these data, it is possible to know not only how many students attended institutions in the public University System of Georgia (USG) or the Technical College System of Georgia (TCSG), but also that Georgia sent 21 students to Harvard last year, 12 to Stanford, 11 to Notre Dame and 194 to Emory – information previously obtainable only with great effort and less accuracy.

Data

GOSA obtained graduate files for the high school classes of 2000-08 from the Georgia Department of Education, and worked with NSC to match those records to enrollment records provided by the colleges in NSC's database. NSC began its enrollment search for each year on September 30th following each high school graduation. These results are based on the aggregate files returned to GOSA from NSC. GOSA did not differentiate in this report between students who enrolled in college immediately after high school and those who enrolled at later dates. Therefore, if a student took a year off (or longer) between high school graduation and their first postsecondary enrollment, that student would still count as a postsecondary participant for his or her school system.

These summary data from NSC include results for each individual student's first postsecondary institution of enrollment after high school; while many students have multiple enrollments at various institutions, or even at the same institution, for the purposes of this report only the first institution of enrollment is counted. The degree totals, however, are not unduplicated counts; in other words, a student who earned multiple degrees is included multiple times. Finally, GOSA did not differentiate between public or private, two year or four year, in-state or out-of-state institutions; if a student enrolled in any type of postsecondary institution at any time after graduating high school, he or she is included in the total for his or her school and system.

Nearly all public and private postsecondary institutions in Georgia currently work with NSC. As of 2008, the only institutions in Georgia which enrolled 1,000 or more students and which did not report attendance and completion data to NSC were:

- American Intercontinental University
- South University
- Art Institute of Atlanta
- Luther Rice Bible College and Seminary
- Bauder College

This report is intended to give a broad, at-a-glance picture of postsecondary enrollment of Georgia public high school graduates across the country, in a way that has not been done before. While the intent is to give a high-level view of postsecondary enrollment, this report still presents details on out-of-state and private enrollment that cannot currently be found anywhere else.

Findings

At the highest level, following are basic data on the postsecondary destinations of Georgia's public high school graduates:

- Between 2000 and 2007, 69.4% of Georgia's high school graduates enrolled in college somewhere after high school;
- In 2008, 64.7% of graduates enrolled in a postsecondary institution the following fall;
- Most high school graduates who attend college stay in Georgia;
- Most high school graduates who attend college do so in public institutions.

USG and TCSG Institutions

Other findings for high school graduates from 2000-08 include the fact that Georgia's research institutions remain popular for many students in many school systems across the state. The University of Georgia, Georgia Tech and Georgia State University were among the top 10 most popular institutions in 141 school systems between 2000 and 2007. In 2008, all three research institutions were among the 10 most popular in the state in terms of the number of students in the class of 2008 enrolled.

Technical Colleges have also been very popular as institutions of first enrollment for Georgia students. In fact, the NSC data showed a TCSG institution as a top 10 most popular institution in 165 school systems from 2000-07. Of those 165, a TCSG institution was the most popular institution in 62 school systems. However, though their popularity is widespread across the state, no TCSG institution was among the top 10 postsecondary institutions in terms of enrollment of the class of 2008. This seems to indicate that large numbers of smaller school systems tend to send their students to TCSG institutions.

Out-of-State Institutions

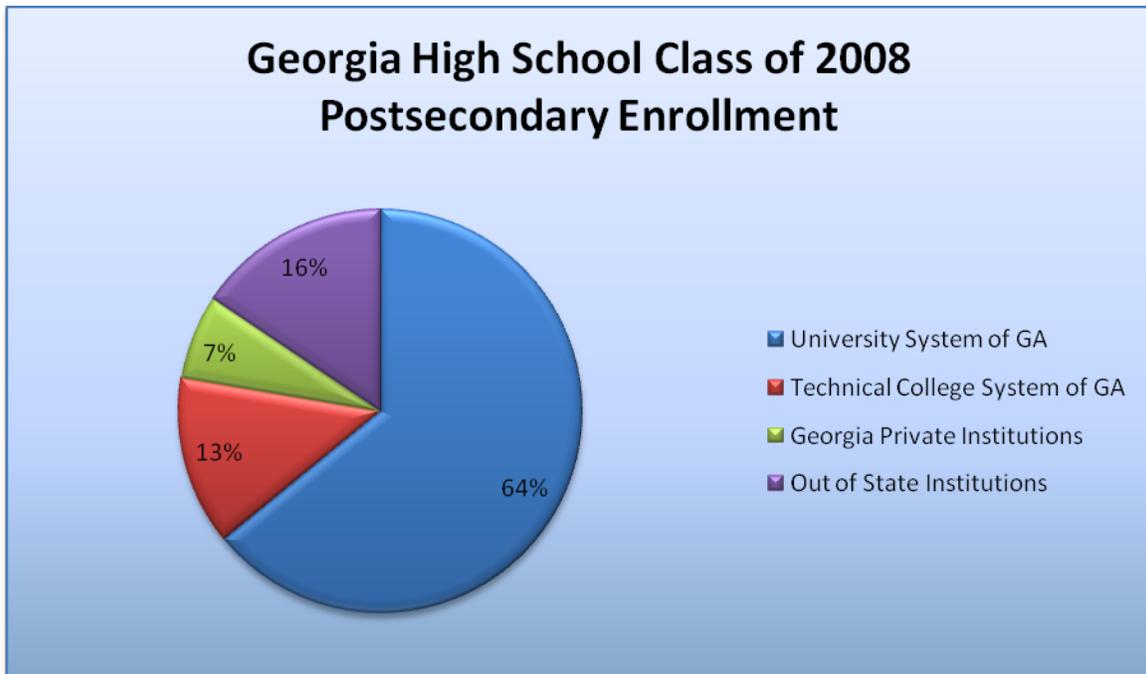

As for students who go out of state for college, most students go to neighboring states, and of these, Alabama has been easily the most popular destination. From 2000-07, Alabama was home to the most popular postsecondary institution for 43 school systems, followed by Florida (8), South Carolina and Tennessee, (7), and North Carolina (3). For the class of 2008, the top 5 most popular out-of-state institutions were all in Alabama, enrolling a total of 1,452 Georgia high school graduates. Auburn University was the most popular out-of-state destination in 2008, enrolling 428 Georgia graduates.

Four of the top 10 most popular out-of-state schools in 2008 were Historically Black Colleges and Universities (HBCUs): Alabama State University (212 graduates), Tuskegee University (165 graduates), Florida A&M University (148 graduates), and South Carolina's Benedict College (114 graduates). Some of Georgia's private HBCUs in the state enrolled similar numbers of public high school graduates compared to their out-of-state counterparts: Spelman College (188 graduates); Clark Atlanta University (187 graduates); and Morehouse University (155 graduates).

Finally, the University of Phoenix, technically headquartered in Arizona, which administers online and private brick-and-mortar campus courses and degrees, was among the 10 most popular institutions in 31 school systems between 2000 and 2007, and it was the most popular “out-of-state” institution in 8 of those systems (though many students attended physical locations in Georgia). The University of Phoenix was the 6th-most popular out-of-state institution for the class of 2008.

Poverty and High School Graduation Rates

GOSA conducted regression analyses with the results for the class of 2008 (shown below), using system postsecondary enrollment rates against the percentage of students by system eligible for free and reduced lunch (FRL), and against each system’s high school graduation rate (HSGR). Both variables were moderately strong predictors of a system’s postsecondary enrollment rate, but the correlations ran in opposite directions, with FRL showing a negative relationship to postsecondary enrollment (-.503) and HSGR showing a positive relationship (.468). This generally means that the higher a school system’s FRL population, the less likely it is for those students to enroll in college. Conversely, the higher a school system’s high school graduation rate, the more likely it is for those students to go on to enroll in college.

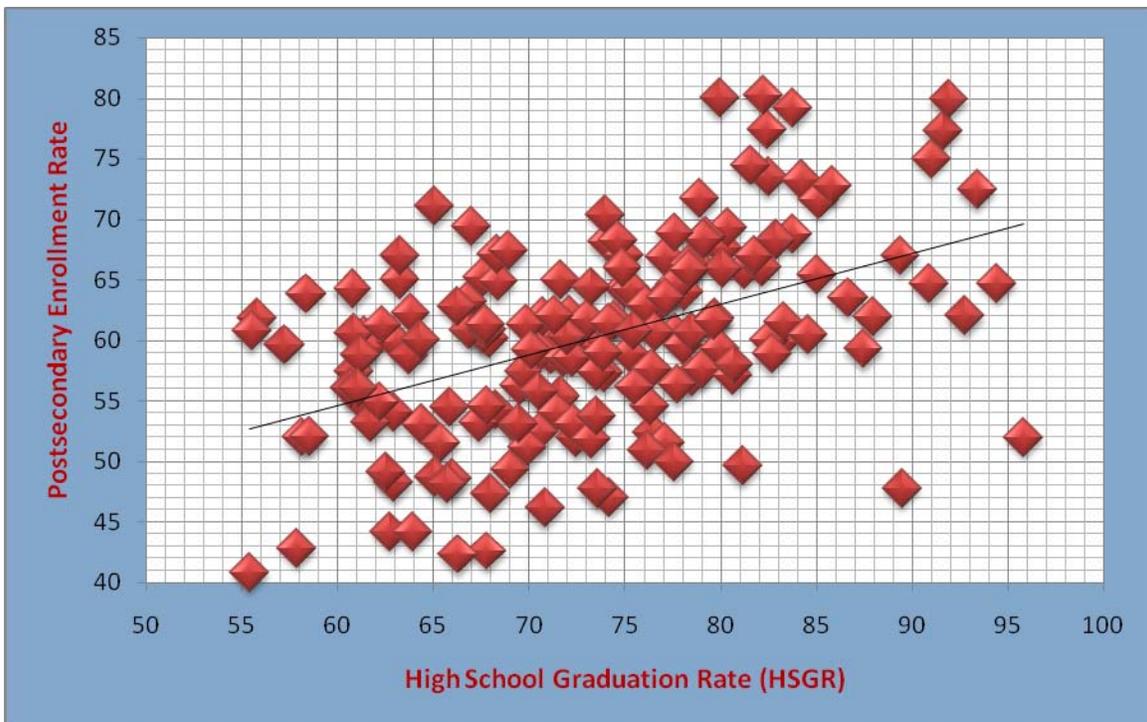

Some school systems performed above the levels the regression would predict. 23 systems had postsecondary enrollment rates 10 points higher than their FRL rate would predict. Of these, 4 were above the state FRL average for 2007-08 and 19 were below the state average. 24 systems had postsecondary enrollment rates 10 points or higher than their HSGR rate would predict. Of these, 3 were below the 2008 state average and 21 were above the state average. 23 systems appeared on both lists as “over-performers”:

Discussion and Implications

The system-level reports that follow detail enrollment rates and patterns for the classes of 2000 through 2008 as well as the most popular (by enrollment) institutions over those years. Some implications that follow from the above findings include:

- If 69.4% of high school graduates from the classes of 2000-08 attended college, then 30.6% of high school graduates have not enrolled in any form of postsecondary education after high school. Also, many high school students are lost in the education “pipeline” before they even reach graduation, and are not accounted for in these data.
- Many students actually begin their postsecondary careers at 2-year institutions. Further studies will determine how many of these students eventually graduate from a 4-year institution (and in how much time).
- While the postsecondary enrollment rate of the class of 2008 (64.7%) is lower than the total from 2000-07 (69.4%), this is likely due to the fact the class of 2008 has only had one year to enroll at this point. GOSA included enrollment beyond the fall following high school graduation for the classes of 2000-07. Further analysis and incoming data for the high school classes of 2009 and beyond will allow for more direct comparisons.
- Some systems “overperformed” in terms of postsecondary enrollments, based on the percentage of students eligible for free and reduced price lunch and their high school graduation rates. A system may send a high percentage of its graduates to college, but only graduate very few students from high school to begin with (and so begin with a low HSGR). A system that “underperforms” on the high school graduation rate measure may graduate a high percentage of students from high school, but not have prepared them well for college, or counseled them in that direction. However, it appears to be the case here that “overperforming” districts do also tend to have higher than average high school graduation rates.
- Similarly, some systems “overperformed” based on their FRL rate. These systems may be sending higher percentages of their graduates to college than would be expected based on their poverty level, but again, these are systems who may be graduating fewer students from high school to begin with. The data seem to suggest even more strongly here, however, that “overperformers” tend to be systems with lower than average FRLs. Finally, it is worth noting again that the analyses in this report do not take into account the types of institutions students attend. It may be the case that some systems send their graduates to more selective colleges on average than other systems, but that question is not addressed here.

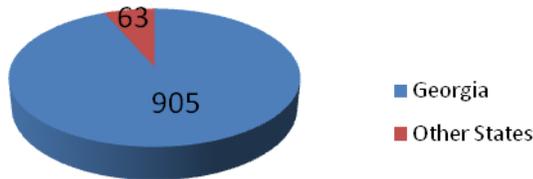

Conclusion

This project is aligned with the state's goal of promoting college- and career-readiness. A clear picture of Georgia students' transition from high school into postsecondary education – whether at public or private institutions, at 2-year, technical, or 4-year schools, and in Georgia or in other states – is a vital and unique piece of these efforts. Future reports from GOSA being conducted by the University of Georgia and scheduled to be released in the Fall of 2009 will include year-by-year analyses of school-level results, as well as more in-depth studies linking NSC data to student data from their high school careers including, for example, attendance, course-taking, demographic, assessment, and other data obtained from state records.
